months which followed when I believed that I was walking in a dream and waking would find me grubbing at my desk in New York. It was so unreal for these days-mosaic romance in the heart of prosaic fact! Was there ever the like? It was real enough, however, in the daytime, when the roar of London hammered at my tears, but when I sat alone in my room it assumed the hazy garments of a dream. Sometimes I caught myself listening for Hillars, a footstep in the corridor, and I would take my pipe from my mouth and wait expectantly. But the door never opened, and the footsteps always passed on. Often in my dreams I stood by the river again. There is solace in these deep, wide streams; We come and go-our hopes, our loves, our ambitions. Nature alone remains. Should I ever behold Gretchen again? Perhaps. Yet there was no thrill at the thought. If ever I beheld her again, it would be when she was placed beyond the glance of my eye, the touch of my hand. She was mine-aye, as a dream might be;

a month or so the affair subsided. The world never stops very long, even when it loses one of its best friends.

One late October morning I received a note which read:

John Winthrop: Dear Sir-I am in London for a few days, home ward bound from a trip to Egypt, and as we are cousins and "orphans, too," I should like the pleasure of making your acquaintance. Trusting that I shall find you at leisure, I am, your humble PHILIP PEMBROKE.

"Ah," said I, "that Louisianian cousin of mine, who may or may not live the year out," recalling the old lawyer's words. "He seems to hang on pretty well. I hope he'll be interesting. Few rich men are. He writes like a polite creditor. What did the old fellow say was the matter with him? Heart trouble or consumption? I can't remember." I threw the note aside and touched up some of my dispatches.

Precisely at 10 o'clock the door opened, and a man came in. He was fashionably dressed, a mixture of Piccadii-ly and bleadway to taste. He was tall, siender, but well formed, and his blond trestache shone out distinctly against a background of tanned skin He had fine blue ayes.

"Have I the palasure of speaking to John Winthrop of New York?" he fagan, taking off his Lat.

I rose. "I am the man." He presented his card, and on it I read, "Philip Pembroke. "Philip Pembroke!" I exclaimed.

"Evidently you are surprised?" showing a set of strong white teeth. "Truthfully I am." I said, taking his hand. "You see," I added apologetically, "your family lawyer-that is-he gave me the-er-impression that you were a sickly fellow-one foot in the grave or something like. I was not expecting a man of your build."

The smile broadened into a deep laugh, and a merry one, I thought enviously. It was so long since I had

J. NEWYON HATHAWAY, M. D. Dr. Hathaway & Co., 25 Bryan Street. Savannah, Ga. MENTION THIS PAPER WHEN WRITING.

Por an hour or more we chatted upon congenial topics. He was surprisingly well informed. He had seen more of the world than I, though he had not observed it so closely. As we were about to leave the door opened, and Phyllis, Ethel and her husband, Mr. Holland, entered. For a moment the room was filled with the fragrance of October air and the essence of violets. They had been in town a week. They had been "doing" the Strand, so Ethel said, and thought they would make me a brief visit to see how "it was done," the foreign corresponding. Mr. Wentworth and his wife were already domiciled at B-, and the young people were going over to enjoy the winter festivities. Phyllis was unchanged. How like Gretchen, I thought.

While Ethel was engaging my in's attention I conducted Phyllis through the office.

"What a place to work in!" said Phyllis, laughing. The laugh awakened a vague ahrill. "Dust, dust-everywhere dust. You need a woman to look after you, Jack.

As I did not reply, she looked plickty at me, and, seeing that my face was grave, she flushed.

"Forgive me, Jack," impulsively "1 did not think." Now is the time when croup and troubles prove rapidly fatal. The loals harmless remedy that produces in me diate results is One Minute Cough dure It is very pleasant to take and can be retied upon to puickly cure coughs, tolds and all lung diseases. It will prevent en numerion. All dealers.

I answered her with a reassiring

"How long are you to remain in town?" I akked to disembarrass ber. "We leave day after tomorrow, Satquickly that you have more than you urday-a day or two in Paris, and then we go on. Every one in New York is talking about your book. I knew that you were capable."

"I hope every one is buying it," said I, passing over her last observation. "Was it here that you wrote it?"

"Oh, no. It was written in my rooms under the most favorable circumstances." "I thought so. This is a very dipary place." "Perhaps I like it for that reason Her eyes were two interrogation points, but I pretended not to see "What nice eyes your cousin las," she said, side glancing. With a woman it is always a man's eyes. "And his father was the man who left you the fortune?" "Yes," I answered, with a short laugh. Of course I had never told Phyllis of that thousand dollar check.

"You must run over this winter and see us," she said. "I anticipate tothing but dinners, balls and diplomatic receptions. I have never been there. It will all be new to me. Think of seeing Egypt, the holy lands, Russia, France and Spain and yet not soeing the very heart of the continent! Tank goodness, I know the language." "And will she not be a sensation?"

joined in Ethel. "A decided sensation," said I, erutinizing the beautiful face so near me. What if they met, as probably they would-Phyllis and Gretchen? "hyllis," said I suddenly, "where were you

"Where was I born?" with a wordering little laugh. "In America. Where did you suppose?" "Eden," said I, "I wasn't sure, so I

"I do not know how to take that," she said, with mock severity. "Oh, I meant Eden when it was paradise!" I hastened to say. "Yes," put in Pembroke. "Please go back, Miss Landors, and begin the world all over again."

"Phyllis," said I in a whisper, "have you ever met that remarkable affinity of yours?" I regretted the words the moment they had crossed my lips. "Yes, you are changed, as I said the other night," distrustfully. "There is something in your voice that is clining. ed. You have grown cynical. But your question was impertinent. Tave you found yours?"

I was expecting this. "Yes," I said. "Once I thought I had; now I am sure of it. Some day I shall tell you an interesting story.'

desk. "Are you at liberty?"

"No: I have only just met my cousin and have promised to dine with him." "If that is all, bring him along, like his face." We passed out of the fileroom.

"Phyllis, we must be going, dear," I led Phyllis down the narrow stairs.

A handsome victoria stood at the curb. "I shall be pleased to hear your story," said she.

It occurred to me that the tale might' not be to her liking, so I said, "But it is one of those disagreeable storiesone where all should end nicely, but doesn't; one which ends leaving the hero, the heroine and the reader dissatisfied with the world in general and the author, who is fate, in particular."

I knew that she was puzzled. She wasn't quite sure that I was not referring to the old affair.

"If the story is one I never heard before," suspiciously, "I should like to

"And does it not occur to you," throwing back the robes so that she might step into the victoria, "that fate has a special grudge against me? Once was not enough, but it must be

"And she does not love you? Are you quite sure? You poor fellow." She squeezed my hand kindly. "Shall I be candid with you?" with the faintest flicker of coquetry in her smile. "As in the old days," said I, glancing over my shoulder to see how near the others were. A groom is never to be considered, "Yes, as in the old days," "Well, I have often regretted that I did not accept you as an experiment."

Then I knew that she did not under-"You must not think I am jesting," said I seriously. "The story is of the bittersweet kind. The heroine loves me, cannot be mine." "Loves you?" with a slight start. 'How do you know?"

"She has told me so," lowering my Frankness of this sort to a woman who has rejected you has a peculiar effect. The coquetry faded from her smile, and there was a perceptible contraction of the brows. Her eyes, which were looking into mine, shifted to the back of the groom. No, I shall never understand a woman. She should have been the most sympathetic woman in the world, yet she appeared to "What's all this between you and declared: "never." "Then I shall always have the exquisite pleasure of being a supplicant for your pardon. It is delightful to sue pardon of a beautiful woman." Phyllis sniffed.

"Forgive him at once," said Ethel, "If only for that pretty speech." Mr. Holland pulled out his watch suggestively.

poor Hillars had never known.

"Vienna!" I exclaimed. "Yes. It was at a concert. Her face was indelibly graven on my memory. I asked a neighbor who she was; but gone. I should like to see more of her." So Gretchen had been in Vienna, and

I took Pembroke to the club that afternoon, and we dallied in the bigiard room till time to dress for dinner. Dinner came. But Phyllis forgot to ask me about the story, at which I grew puzzled, considering what I know of woman's curiosity. And she debted most of her time to Pembroke, while did not mind.
